Air-L-a-w Law. The people in commotion, Conceived a monstrous notion, And then in their devotion, Devised a mihtgy Bank : Then to the world great pleasures, Did promise with her treasures, They issued out her measures, Until her bounties stank. This Harlot and her Daughters.

Have sat on many waters, But now their vessel totters, They're all beset with fears; O ye mighty Banking nation, Your mothers in vexation, Beware her lamentation,

With sympathining lears. You once was sorely tried, When your old mother died, Being justly crucined, When our bold Jackson led ; Yet her honor she regained. In Pennsylvanta reigned.

When Nicholals she obtained, But now, good Lord she's Dead! Tho' oftentimes she struggled. The people's money smuggled, And with her wise men juggled, Her deeds are brought to light; Becau-e she did bereave us.

Did wilfully deceive us. In greater need del leave us, We'll put her out of sight. Now, poor old soul, she's rotten, Like filthy rags of cotton, She soon should be forgotten. And ne'er be called to mind : Yet t'would be right to mention. When she was in suspension, With are gent intention. She did the nation grind. She had the art to flatter.

The rich, the poor, no maiter, Their interest did tatter. When e'er it pleased her well ; For this the mighty nation, Sends forth her condemnation, The winds of all creation, Should send it down to hell. Farewell, you old beguiler. You never can tempt Tyler. Jackson did bur-t your biler.

In days of your deceit;

You begg'd of him attention, Most serious to mention, He granted no extension, Because you were a cheat. Sullivan County, May, 1843.

The Dying Child.

'Tis dying! life is yielding place To that my serious charm, Which spreads upon the troubled face A fixed unchanging calm, That deepens as the parting breath Is gently sinking into death. A thoughtful beauty rests the while

But those pale lips could never smile More radiantly than now-And sure some heavenly dreams begin To dawn upon the soul within! Oh, that those mildly conscious lips Were parted to reply-

To tell how death's severe eclipse Is passing from thine eve; For living eye can never see The change that death hath wrought in thee. Perhaps the sight is wandering far Throughout the kindled sky, Miracing every infant star Amid the firmes on high: Souls of the just whose path is bent Around the glorious firmament-Perhaps thine eye is gazing down Upon the earth below. Rejoicing to have gained the crown And hurried from its woe,

To dwell beneath the throne of Him Before whose glory heaven is dim-Thy life! how cold it might have been If days had grown to years; How dark, how deeply stained with sin, With wearn ess and tears! How happy thus to sink to rest, So early numbered with the blest. 'Fis well then that the smile should lie Upon thy marble check ;

Of all that men can leath from heaven. A Woman

In a moment after, a single gentleman came in. 'The Cape Ann stage in?' inquired he. Yes, sir said the bar-keeper. One back seat inside. responded the gentlemen and went into the back room. In this way several entered, some engaging back seats inside, some two or three took front seats inside, and one took an outside seat.

I remarked to the bar-keeper that there was a great deal of travel on the Cape Ann route, observing at the same time, that it was a little strange that passengers should prefer a stage to a rail road; besides, how do you find so many seats?

The bar-keeper looked shy, put his finger to his nose, and winked, I was a little suspicious before, but at this manœuvre I knew there was mystery, and determined to find it out, commenced questioning him. He looked wise, twisted himself a little, and said, then you don't know the secret. No, said I, but I have a great curiusity to do so.
